These Hand-Dyed Mesh Tops Are a Visual Feast

Like it or loathe it, Y2K style is back. Juicy Couture is relaunching, TikTok stars are obsessed with 2000s fashion, and models such as Bella Hadid have stepped out in mesh tees reminiscent of the era, which is all about maximalism.

However, just because the throwback aesthetic is trending doesn't mean it has to be cheesy or stuck in the past. Take the garments from Noon Cottage Industry, an Instagram brand specializing in hand-dyed mesh tops. Most of the prints are full paintings, depicting graphic scenes on a hazy mesh canvas cut into tops and dresses. The style is reminiscent of tattoo art (also a Y2K motif) and comic books, with the sex appeal dialed up to a 10 thanks to the slinky silhouettes. They're a visual feast.

From Paris Fashion Week Spring 2021

The Best Street Style

Paris Fashion Week's combined digital and physical season kicked off with IRL spectacles from Coperni, Koché, and Christian Dior and will conclude, a week from now, with physical shows from Chanel and a virtual experience from Louis Vuitton. In that time, Parisians and the rare international guest will be shuttling through the City of Light—safely and socially distant, of course—on a daily basis. Acielle, the photographer behind Style du Monde, will be on the scene to document the best street style for Vogue.

It's Always Sunny at Sydney Fashion Week

If 2020 had been like any other year, I would be half-way around the world right now in sunny Sydney for Mercedes Benz Fashion Week Australia. I'd attend shows at Carriageworks, I'd treat myself to the cliff walk from Bondi to Bronte, and I'd enjoy my favorite burger in the whole world at Mary's in Newtown. But this year is not like any other. The coronavirus crisis has us all in lockdown indoors, with international travel all but impossible. In Australia, Sydney's annual Resort fashion week has been canceled.

Thinking about my friends in Oz, I can't help but be reminded by Dan Roberts's fantastic street style images from the week. His eye for street fashion is immediately evident, but what I've enjoyed about standing beside him while so many of these images were taken is that he can always find a little bit of warm sunlight—no matter what. That quality radiates throughout all this work—I can't recommend his non-fashion photos enough—but it makes looking back on my memories from Down Under especially rosy.

At Bunka Fashion College in Tokyo, Students Show Their Personal Style

It's no more secret the fact that Bunka Fashion College in Tokyo is one of the most revered fashion institutions in the world since it was founded in 1919. "All students and staff members of Bunka Fashion College share an immense love for fashion," says the college president.

After months of lockdown, schools across Japan have reopened their doors, allowing a physical return to class with social-distancing measures in place. Here, 10 students of Bunka Fashion College share their experiences of doing coursework remotely, virtual tutorials, what it feels like to return to college, and what they wore to commemorate their first day back.

Minami Urushibata, 22

BA Fashion Director

I'm wearing my favorite Molly Goddard pale-blue dress, Miu Miu's ballerina slippers, and a Vermeerist BEAMS' velvet bag.

Ryo Ishikawa, 22

BA Fashion Design

The styling theme today is all about survival, which is what this year has been about.

Haruka Miura, 22

BA Fashion Global Business

I'm wearing straight-leg, light-blue Levi's with black Dr Martens six-eye boots, but the black Prada puffer jacket is the main attraction, of course.
